Thesis in International and Comparative Climate Change Law & Policy: Access to Justice Reloaded. The Role of International Law in National Climate Change Cases (Supervisors: Jørn Øyrehagen Sunde, Sigrid Eskeland Schütz, Christian Franklin). Defence: 4 June 2021. Committee: Jessica Schultz, Beate Sjøfjell and Louis Kotzé. Excerpt from the committee's evaluation: "Colombo's dissertation is an independent, scientific piece of work, which contributes to the development of new knowledge [...] focusing on whether and how international law can contribute to domestic courts' reasoning when individuals and non-governmental organisations (NGOs) seek access to justice in climate change matters. This is a very topical study, which is both original and certainly of interest to a broader global audience working in the domain of (transnational) environmental law. The committee finds that the candidate provides a solid, well-informed analysis of how environmental law principles can assist domestic courts to adapt to the unique features and dilemmas posed by climate change litigation. The thesis consists of numerous chapters that are comprehensively argued and very well referenced. One of the main strengths of the thesis is the depth and breadth of the extensive literature review. The committee is also impressed by the ambition of the thesis and the extensive research area it seeks to cover"
